How did you talk to your family about VR?

1, I begged my sister to register to vote and when she refused I kept talking about it till she went and did it. (I do not have a picture of us together she is very camera shy :(() And my parents are already registered so I did not need to ask them.

2. My friends and family have known about my involvement with Vietlead for years now, and understand that what I'm trying to do is important to me. So, they trust that when I'm asking them to do something, it's for a good cause and is meaningful.

3. Well, I knew my mom was not registered yet. On one afternoon, I verbally asked her, "you want me to register you to vote?" Then, we filled the application out. The end.

How was doing voter registration ? (ThruText, Phonebanking, Relational organizing)

4. Doing voter registrations was somewhat challenging as it was clearly my first time doing this. After awhile, I got the hang of things and it got a lot easier. Doing it on ThruText was much easier since it's kind of a slower pace and more easier to understand what the other person is saying. Phone Banking was a challenge as it was sometimes hard to hear.

5. It was not that hard, for doing text banking and relational organizing, but phone banking was kind of a challenge. Overall we got the word out to people who needed it and it feels good.

6. It was nerve wracking a first because we were calling complete strangers. But overtime I got used to the aggressiveness and bleh of the people I was calling. Thru text was really easy along with relational organizing.

How do you think your attitude or perspective towards civic engagement has changed? How so?

- Candy: I used to think that civic engagement couldn't be done virtually, through this internship, I realized that there's a lot being done behind the scenes as well
- Lisa: I thought it was a lot of work and it was T_T. Worth it though
- Fionna: I honestly didn't know much about the topics so i thought it was going to be boring but it is actually eye opening.
